

AT THE END OF THE HARVEST: Someone Named Patrick - Book 3 - Part Two

The Young Dogs Project was an experimental long term study conducted by a group of Russian scientists during the cold war when an undetermined number of young people mostly good students from specific countries were injected with a chip in their brains for a large sort of issues. The specific and individual control that these young people suffered during their lives under the central control of these scientists is the main source of this story. This story is based on one of those individuals: Patrick, an honor student from Northern Ireland who obtained a scholarship in the 1960s to study a career as an international reporter. All along his life after he became controlled by this project, everything turned wrong to him. His personal as well as his professional endeavors were always ended in an abrupt manner. By his thirtieth birthday he entered into a depression that brought him to the use of drugs and alcohol and ashamed to return to his family he decided to move alone to live in New York where he spent most of his life struggling from Company to Company trying very hard to fulfill his dreams that never came true. During his stay in New York he met a young child in the building where he was living who always knocked at his door and over the years became an allied to him in his fight against an invisible enemy.
