

Change

Leadership, management and change touch upon essential issues, such as individuals inner world and attitudes within given teams, as well as the culture cultivated by the leader within a team or company. They are also concerned with employees worries, insecurity in the workplace due to the chaotic current times, a reduction in costs, as well as imminent matters like strategy, competition, future products, or services of an (non-profit) organisation. Therefore, it is the leaders duty to be able to manage all the above parameters in the best possible way and for the interest of all the implicated parties. Still, even if they have been extensively discussed in the past, such principles remain wishful thinking, since circumstances do not seem to have changed in such a way as to serve the common good, but merely personal interests. While leadership may be communicated through the leader to the rest of the people in the organisation by means of leadership actions and attitudes, individual change is still in a state of self-defence and could be paralleled to a large wall which is hard to tear down or surmount. Moreover, leadership and change seem to be interconnected, since leadership entails essential changes, while change requires leadership features. This book includes theories and practices for anyone who want to Change himself, peers or managers and leaders.
