

A Linguistic Approach to the Application and Teaching of the English Alphabet (Studies in Linguistics and Semiotics, V. 16)

The book approaches the nature of the alphabet and its teaching as a universal concept as well as a language-specific one. With focus on the teaching of the English alphabet, the book calls for a departure from the traditional phonics approach simply because of its failure to objectively and accurately handle the alphabet as a linguistic system and an important tool of oracy and literacy. Typically, phonics fails to recognize all the functionally relevant identities of the alphabet, and it seriously confuses between and among those identities in a manner that renders the teaching of language skills and sub-skills - listening, speaking, reading, writing, spelling, etc - highly unreliable and even erroneous. The alternative approach recommended here scrutinizes the nature of the alphabet and comes up with four different linguistic identities: phoneme, grapheme, nomeneme, and sequeme. Each is objectively reexamined and redefined so as to identify where and how each identity should be recognized and applied. This radical distinction implies the institution of different methodologies and strategies to teach them. Additionally, the book emphasizes the significant differences in the teaching of the alphabet in the context of different languages, especially in the linguistically and culturally diverse learning situations encountered in ESL, bilingual and foreign language classes. Finally, the overall approach, methodology and the techniques recommended for the teaching of the alphabet as a linguistic system is solidly embedded in the most recent findings in the field of education, linguistics, cognitive and developmental psychology, including the Multiple Intelligences Theory.
