

The Human Side of Work, Yesterdays Lessons Forgotten?

Most people spend a large proportion of their lives at work. A machine does what it is programmed to do. It cannot use initiative and have ideas on alternative and better ways of working. People can, but they need to be motivated and not just instructed. Much work was done on these aspects of work organisations in the period from the 1930s to 1960s. This book outlines the resulting organisation theories and how their application brought success. However, the modern trend for centralised control and bureaucracy now hides much of this and the real value of human work is being lost. Read about it.
